To learn more about what the motion capture technology in FIFA 22 can do for you, we talked to three of the producers that helped develop the technology, and shadowed some of the world’s top motion capture experts at the motion capture field testing camp in Los Angeles this past summer to show what the technology can do. The motion capture technology allowed the gameplay mechanics of FIFA 22 to stay true to the core mechanics of the sport, while giving players the ability to build attacks in new ways. With the ball and players moving faster and reactively, the game feels more fluid, and attacks are more explosive. Speed is gained through a number of different elements, and the fact that players are more responsive to on-ball actions is empowering. Each player now has an “attacking impact” rating that affects the flow of the gameplay, and the player ratings are also influenced by the attacking impact rating. Impact gives players more confidence to try more attacks and take more risks. Players are less conservative and try to exploit new passing options that are available when the players are more responsive to your on-ball tactics. The A.I. algorithms are also more reactive to players’ movements to get more accurate targeting. The independent A.I. for players now works better to take control of the game as you place the ball, and an attacking impact rating is tied to the player’s ability to create space and draw defenders out of position, and the A.I.’s reaction to the movements of those players. Using micro-gestures to control players One of the biggest change in the evolution of the A.I. is that the game uses micro-gestures to help A.I. control players. These micro-gestures give more control to the player’s freedom of movement, reacting to the speed at which the players make the actions that draw defenders out of position. Whether it is the player controlling their own jump, or kicking the ball with a certain direction, the micro-gestures are used to give more control over the player’s movements. This makes the game more realistic than ever before. Micro-gestures are used more when the player is defending and creating shots as well as when the player is controlling the ball and creating attacks. As the player is more controlled, the player’s performance becomes more instinctive. The micro-gestures allow players to react to opportunities as they happen, and the micro-gest

Agmatine, an endogenously formed amine, is widely distributed in nature, including in several vertebrate organs and plants. Recent studies have shown that agmatine is involved in multiple biological functions. However, agmatine is rapidly metabolized and is unstable. Thus, it is difficult to analyze the levels of agmatine in the blood and tissues. In this study, to evaluate whether the amount of agmatine in human tissues is stable, the metabolism of agmatine in human liver tissue, human skin tissue, and human U-937 cells was examined. In human liver tissue, the urinary elimination rate of agmatine was very low and agmatine was undetectable in the blood. Furthermore, the agmatine concentration in the tissue was about four times lower than in the urine. In human skin tissue, agmatine was detected only in the urine, but it was detected in the blood, at a level approximately 100 times higher than in the tissue. In human U-937 cells, agmatine was mainly detected in the urine, and agmatine levels in the culture medium were
