Why can't I set UITableViewCell's accessory type programmatically? I'm trying to set UITableViewCell's accessory type programmatically as follows: UITableViewCellAccessoryCheckmark = UITableViewCellAccessoryType.Checkmark; But I always get a warning: [CAAssemblyDescription] Attribute 'Checkmark' is only allowed on Objective-C methods, not functions. Is there something missing? Is this possible at all? A: It's possible! Apple has provided a class called UIAccessoryView for exactly this purpose. You can also specify the accessory type as follows: cell.accessoryType = UITableViewCellAccessoryCheckmark; For example, this saves the user having to use code like the following: [UITableViewCellAccessoryCheckmark] Further, if you have an instance of an accessory view that you want to set an accessory type to, you can do so by invoking it's -setAccessoryType: method. A: Your method signature should be like this: - (void)setAccessoryType:(UITableViewCellAccessoryType)anAccessoryType A: Accessories are generally associated with a particular kind of cell. From the Apple docs on Accessory Views: Accessory views are placed on a cell's content view to represent an individual kind of accessory, for example a checkmark or an image. That may mean that you can do this in the nib file, but not code.

From the docs on Accessory View Class Reference: In a nib, the default view for an accessory view class is set to a custom

It's a landmark case that could have implications across the continent. In a unanimous 7-0 decision released Tuesday, the court ruled the Charter of Rights and Freedoms requires a trial at which the accused has a right to be tried before a judge and jury in the accused's home country. "We have no doubt that the outcomes of the proceedings abroad will be prejudiced, and the presumption of innocence will be disregarded," wrote Justice Thomas Cromwell. "But that is the reality of cases tried in other countries, which are often decided by juries without a right of appeal." The decision, which will affect at least 10 criminal defendants around the world, leaves a wide legal gulf between Canada and the United States, which has adopted a "universal jurisdiction" policy, under which Canadian suspects of serious crimes can be brought into U.S. courts regardless of where the crime was committed. In Canada, such cases go through the justice system in Canada, and that has implications from the time a case is posted in court — when Canada maintains custody of the suspect — to the time when a verdict or sentence is handed down, which typically is followed by execution of sentence. "Whether the accused's trial is before a judge or before a jury, he has an absolute right to a trial at which he can be found not guilty if he is not guilty, and guilty if he is guilty," Cromwell wrote. The case at issue was brought by Carlos Lomeli in 2010, who was accused of rape after travelling to Mexico to be with a woman he'd met online. Lomeli and his lawyer had argued that his trial in Mexico — which was scheduled to start in less than a month — would violate the principles of fundamental justice and would undermine the presumption of innocence. There was no dispute that Lomeli had sex with the woman — just whether that constituted sexual
