Bertrand Russell famously argued that we should only ask questions that we can answer. I have read that he was the first to conceptualize this idea, and I would tend to assume that he would have been comfortable in recommending the idea. Yet I have also read his very famous essay, "Concerning the Unwarranted Assertion, Found in Logical Atomism" in which he explicitly takes great care to emphasize that his ability to confidently assert X should not be confused with his ability to justify X rationally. An intuitive way to put this: You can perfectly well be perfectly confident in your assertions that p, even if you cannot prove it. This seems to align with the logic of Dewey's instrumental realism, which I have also read favorably. Moreover, it looks to be explicitly aligned with many of the classic arguments for naturalism, as well as with various recent arguments against it (Kim for example). One of the things I tend to notice with respect to this idea is a certain implicit implication. An implication that is probably too obvious to count as an explicit argument: If you are asking a question about something you can answer, you are not asking a question in which you can be overconfident. So I don't have a lot of faith in this implicit argument, given that a somewhat obvious
