Mental Health Services (MHS) in rural communities in Thailand face challenges of distance and low literacy rates. We conducted a case study of a Mental Health Association in a rural community of north-central Thailand to improve understanding of challenges faced in mental health service provision in this area. An ethnographic research approach was used. Data were collected from March 2011 to January 2012 using audio interviews with two key informants, 12 semi-structured interviews with community members, and three focus groups with community members. The study was conducted in the municipal area of Sam Phran, a rural province in northern Thailand. Participants included the executive director of a local mental health association, a mental health care administrator, and four community members. Three key informants were interviewed about challenges faced by the association and provided a semistructured interview guide for data collection. Community members, who participated in a focus group, were questioned about their experiences, knowledge, and opinions of mental health. The data were analyzed using the inductive method of constant comparative analysis and the grounded theory method. Ten community members participated in focus groups and 16 participated in

City of Nanaimo staff and local residents gathered Monday to honour four amazing beavers in the city. Crews with the city have been keeping an eye on the tame beavers for the past several weeks, following a boost in its population. The Mayor said it wasn't clear why the spike has occurred, but was glad the beavers made it into city custody. "It was a long journey, but they made it and we are just very lucky to be able to offer them some comfort here today." City staff also surprised the four beavers with a backyard playpen, except this beaver version is called a "sleeping box." Beaver
