The track is designed to train pilots to enjoy the thrill, of suiting up with your phone in hand, while on your way to work, at home, in the car or on the go. To ensure you get the most out of your Samsung Galaxy S8, you can track your flight on the go - whether that's across the apartment or across the country, you can see your flight progress on the track with Flight Radar and you can also ensure the Galaxy S8 is in the correct mode for your surroundings with the new "Flight Prep" feature. Flight Prep is an optimisation tool that gives you insight into the effects that new features may have on your flight. You can determine factors such as mode, display brightness and phone orientation and also determine suitable settings for places such as the car and away from your home - which is perfect for working places or when travelling. If you're feeling a little green with the whole mobile phone thing, download the app and get up and running. If you have a few months to spare, you can pick up a unit for yourself at most Carphone Warehouse stores across the UK. Meanwhile, if you're already own the handset, you can download Flight Radar here. ElleKam Nadella In 2010 Microsoft bought Nokia's Here mapping division for USD 117 million. Here's the deal: Nokia was expanding, realised it was becoming too big to operate effectively as a standalone company and was needing to divest itself of many things. Unfortunately for them, when Nokia finally sold the Here division, maps were the cherry on top and the former smartphone titan had effectively just sold its soul and its map heritage and, it wasn't long until Microsoft decided that it was time to swoop in and grab one of the biggest, and best, assets of the business. With the sale of Nokia's Here division netting Microsoft $7 billion in cash and $750 million in precious patent licenses, the company really just had to sit back and take a moment and sigh a small content with themselves.
