To determine if there is an association between changes in task-related activation of dorsolateral prefrontal cortex (DLPFC) and anterior cingulate cortex (ACC) and performance during a test of interference control after adaptation to a stable visual environment. Nine control participants and nine participants with right DLPFC lesions were presented with 16 blocks of a Stroop task during which the number of errors and time to complete the task increased over the experiment. During baseline testing, all participants performed well. Adaptation to a stable visual environment significantly increased errors and time to complete the task by 13% and 15%, respectively. During testing with a drop in error scores, control participants showed greater increases in DLPFC and ACC activation than participants with right DLPFC lesions. Although we did not find a difference in activation between the two groups, patients with right DLPFC damage showed a rightward shift in the correlation between DLPFC activation and increased performance.

Ancient Siouan House The Ancient Siouan House is a historic building located at 1201 Second Avenue, east of Tahlequah, Oklahoma, USA. Description and history

The house has a limestone foundation and false front, a gable roof, and a cast iron balustrade. The false front was built around the 1870s, and a brick wing was added around 1900. The house was originally built to accommodate the farmer who lived in the house and his family. Originally, the land belonged to James A. Coe. It was at the end of his farm, where the house now stands. Around 1870, Coe built a crib barn. Around 1900, he added a brick wing to the house to use as a guest house. The house is built on a bluff overlooking the prairie. The house was listed on the National Register of Historic Places on September 5, 1985.
